

If This Sounds Like Your Firm, You Might Need New Billing Software

If invoicing has your firm running around in circles, losing billable hours, or waiting on payments, it might be time for a new billing software solution that addresses or even eliminates these issues.

Circle YES or NO to figure out whether it's time to invest in a new solution.

YES or NO: Are you using processes that aren't scalable for growth?

Streamlining the billing process can help your firm ramp up as your matters and client lists grow.

Your ideal software should allow you to use electronic invoicing to send invoices, reminders, and consistent client communication promptly and securely via email. It should also accommodate the various billing arrangements you may need to support as your firm expands, whether hourly, retainer, fixed fee, split billing, or contingency.

YES or NO: Are you using only a fraction of the systems and software you pay for?

If your firm invested in a solution that seemed well-rounded but turned out to have a little too much filler than you need for your day-to-day operations, why keep paying for it?

You don't want the system you use to make money or track time to cost you both.

YES or NO: Are you letting your software or its limitations dictate your processes?

Your firm shouldn't have to craft processes that are workarounds to accommodate systems you pay to use.

For example, if your time-tracking software requires manual syncs or entry into your billing process, your workflows aren't optimized for accuracy and efficiency. (But when you use software with built-in time-tracking, they will be!)

If you answered YES to any of the above, it's time to talk about solutions.

Recognizing the signs that your law firm needs new billing software could be crucial for maintaining efficiency, accuracy, and client satisfaction.
